17. Weather

17.1. Statistical meteorological data, based on information of the past 5 years.

The climate of the city of Córdoba, is humid subtropical, moderated by the Pampas winds, cold winds that blow from the Southwestern quadrant, originating in Antarctica.

There are four marked seasons. Summer run from late November until early March, and brings days between 28°C and 33°C and nights between 15 °C and 19°C with frequent thunderstorms. Heat waves are common, and bring days with temperatures over 38 °C and hot, sticky nights; however, Pampero winds are sure to bring relief with thunderstorms and a day or two of cool, crisp weather: nighttime temperatures can easily descend to 12 °C, but the heat starts building up right away the next day.

Due to the extension of the metropolitan area, there exists a difference of 5 °C between the central area and the Greater Córdoba. The central district, a dense high-rise area is located in a depression, and it is the core of an important heat island. May is a mild month, during the month temperatures are quite low, especially during the day. Daytime temperatures go from 26-27 ° at the beginning of this month to 21-22 ° at the end of May. Nighttime temperatures go from 12-13 ° at the beginning of May to 10-11 ° at the end of the month. The sky is in half the cases clear. However, there are also days with cloudy or mostly cloudy sky. Rarely are there days with drizzle and rain or foggy days.

During May, there is usually very weak or light breezes, but in some exceptional cases, the strong breeze can reach 37-38 km / h.

18. Other matters
